October at the Lake

October has a way of inviting us to slow down.

The mornings at the lake are quieter now. The light is softer, the days a little shorter, and the familiar rhythms of summer are giving way to something new.

I've been thinking about how much wonder can be found in these ordinary transitions. Sometimes all it takes is a moment to notice.

Life Lately: Abundance

This summer, the garden reminded me that good things don't always arrive on our schedule.

For weeks, the cucumbers seemed determined not to grow. I wondered whether we'd have enough for even a few jars of pickles. And then, almost overnight, we had more than we knew what to do with.

There were cucumbers on the counter, jars waiting to be filled, and plenty of reminders that sometimes abundance comes when we least expect it.

A Little Invitation

This week, find a few minutes to sit somewhere quiet. Bring your coffee or tea, watch the world around you, and notice something you might ordinarily overlook.

Sometimes the smallest moments leave the loveliest impressions.

Until next time...

Cheryl

Come sit awhile. There's room on the swing.
